

Master of Disguise

Costume designer Candy Keane weaves her seamstress skills into entrepreneurial gold

"I'm sorry, I'm really exhausted," explains Candy Keane (her real name) as she rubs her hands across her forehead. Tall and athletic, Keane is sitting in one of the leopard-print chairs inside her costume and lingerie shop, Three Muses Inspired Clothing.

"I was out until 3 a.m. handing out cards at Eclipse," she continues, referring to the Riverside nightclub where she went last night, dressed in Steampunk garb (think Victorian-era fashion mixed with sci-fi elements like ray guns and goggles) to hand out business cards.

Some nine hours later, Keane is struggling to find words to describe her transformation from journalism student to promo model to costume designer to small business owner. Located in the Mandarin Square shopping center, her emporium boasts a collection of brightly colored wigs, hosiery, shoes, lingerie, corsets and a slew of costume accessories. If you're looking for rainbow thigh-highs, a pair of ruffle-butt underwear, neon pink fishnet gloves, a psychedelic paisley dress or a pair of butterfly wings, Keane's the gal to see.

"My vision for the store is that people can create their own original outfit using bits and pieces," she explains. "It's basically a dress-up shop." Keane gets slammed on Halloween and Valentine's Day and her typical clients are women who are looking to spice up their love life, stage a boudoir photo shoot, attend a theme party or who are just hardcore role players who, like Keane, attend comic book and sci-fi conventions.

Keane's love of theatrics and costuming led to a kind of modeling called cosplay (short for "costume play"). She's been to nearly every major convention, including DragonCon in Atlanta, Orlando's Star Wars Celebration, Comic-Con in San Diego, FetishCon in Tampa and Jacksonville's own Ancient City Con. Over the past few years, she's become somewhat of a celebrity in the costuming subculture. Thumbing through a rack of colorful wigs that appear to be made out of Slinkys, she explains, "We wear them in this group of Sith cheerleaders I dress up with."

Born in Huntsville, Ala., and raised in Sarasota, the 35-year-old Keane has been making costumes for as long as she can remember. "My mom and my grandma are my inspiration," she says. "I spent summers in Alabama and my grandma would teach me crocheting, sewing, macramé, plaster casting, painting, knitting — you name it — and I weaved those skills into costume designing."

At the same time, Keane's mom made a big to-do of Halloween — custom designing and constructing her outfit months ahead of time. "We would wait all year for Halloween," Keane laughs of dressing up as a court jester, Raggedy Ann or a belly dancer. "It was the most important holiday in my family."

Keane has played a lot of different professional roles as well. After graduating from the University of Florida with a BA in magazine journalism, she moved to San Francisco with her now-husband for his job in advertising. There, she worked as a freelance website writer until the dot-com bubble burst. Not sure what to do next, she started working at a chain bath-and-lotion shop in Union Square.

"I saw people doing promo work out in the square. They were handing out candy, having fun and making like $5 more than me per hour," Keane remembers. So she quit her job hawking hand soap and started doing promotions. That, in turn, snowballed into modeling, but Keane didn't want to dress in off-the-rack items, or as she describes it, "clothes that everyone had." So she started making her own costumes.

Keane enjoyed the work. She fondly remembers the Playboy mansion parties she attended while living in California. Her shop features a framed invitation to the 2007 Midsummer Night's Dream Party — an annual event at the mansion, and one that aired on E! Channel's reality show, "The Girls Next Door." "I made my own butterfly-lingerie costume [for the party]," she says. "I watched that episode over and over and kept trying to find myself."

When asked why she never hooked up with Hugh Hefner or posed for Playboy, Keane simply answers, "I was someone more interested in dressing up and putting on the clothes than taking them off. And I love my husband."

Fittingly, Keane met her husband of eight years, Sean Keane, at a Halloween party in college. She was dressed as a genie, he as William Wallace from "Braveheart." "He loves to dress up, too," Keane says as she flips through a photo album. "He gets into it and goes to events and conventions with me." Sean, a reservist Sergeant Major in the Army Special Forces, is currently stationed in Afghanistan. In the early 2000s, Sean started getting deployed overseas while Keane stayed behind in San Diego and continued her promo work, commercial swimwear modeling and costume designing. But it got lonely. In 2004, the couple decided to settle back in the Southeast where they both had family. The U-Haul they rented wouldn't fit everything, so Keane decided to sell online some of the costumes she'd made. They sold well and she realized it was a niche market she could fill.

So in 2005, she started an online version of Three Muses Inspired Clothing (named for her grandma, her mom and her) and started offering her original designs. Some of her best-selling costumes, which cost between $300 and $700, include Wonder Woman, Leeloo from "The Fifth Element," Princess Leia's slave-girl outfit from "Star Wars," Ultraviolet, Aeon Flux, and Madonna from her Material Girl days. The site became so popular that Keane opened a storefront on San Jose Boulevard in 2009.

As a new small business owner, Keane wasn't able to dress up and model as much as she wanted, so a friend suggested that she go to DragonCon in Atlanta. It was love at first sight. She was introduced to the world of cosplay or dressing up and "being" a character. She considers herself more of a cosplay model and less of a "cosplayer" because she doesn't act out skits, but rather poses for photos with fans and revelers.

"I'm always happy to take a photo with people because more photos equals more exposure for my business," she says. "My favorite part is the kids. When they ask if you're really Wonder Woman, then you know you got the costume right." Keane goes on to explain that when people take photos of her at conventions, it's so commonplace it almost seems like a normal, everyday activity.

Keane's outfits (especially when she's wearing them) have gained a lot of attention over the years — primarily her Princess Leia slave-girl ensemble. She's been featured wearing it on E! Channel's "25 Most Memorable Swimsuit Moments," and on the cover of the DVD of the documentary "Jedi Junkies" — and actress Kristen Bell rocks it in the movie "Fanboys."

One year, a few days before Halloween, "Being Erica," a Canadian TV show, rush-ordered three '80s Madonna outfits from Keane for one of the episodes. "I stayed up all night making them," she remembers. And staff at popular talk show "The View" asked to borrow a costume (thought they never used it). Keane's also been highlighted in print publications like Empire (a British movie magazine), Teeze Magazine and The Pyrates Way.

But Keane's daily work now is less about celebrity and more about attention to detail. A small glass case by the register features mini top hats handmade by a local artist, and an adjacent case contains a collection of silver and stone jewelry created by Keane's 98-year-old great-grandfather. She also offers custom masquerade masks made by her mother and a rack full of miniskirts sewn by her grandmother in Alabama.

The rest of Three Muses is chock-full of the "Costumes & Corsets" promised on the large plastic banner outside. There are piles of plastic jelly bracelets, full knee-length petticoats, even a pair of silver glitter, platform stack boots. Whether she's shipping off a Halloween costume custom-designed for "America's Next Top Model" McKey Sullivan, or being interviewed at Comic-Con for Joss Whedon and Morgan Spurlock's new documentary, "Episode 4: A Fan's Hope," Keane gets to flex every facet of her personality. Superhero, sci-fi vixen, wife, business owner, seamstress: So far, she hasn't found one role that doesn't fit. □
